Search and Seizure Cases in the October 2012 Term of the Supreme Court

Charles Doyle
Senior Specialist in American Public Law

September 4, 2012
Summary

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized. U.S. Const. Amend. IV.

This term, the Supreme Court considers whether (1) deploying a drug-detecting dog at the front door of a house qualifies as a Fourth Amendment search (Florida v. Jardines); (2) the positive reaction of a trained, drug-detecting dog constitutes probable cause per se (Florida v. Harris); and (3) the rationale which permits the warrantless, suspicionless detention of individuals found in a place covered by a search warrant also permits the warrantless, suspicionless off-site apprehension and return of individuals who have recently left a place covered by a search warrant (Bailey v. United States).

The Supreme Court has said in the past that walking a drug-detecting dog around a car pulled over on the highway or around luggage in an airport is not a Fourth Amendment search. The Florida Supreme Court in Jardines held that bringing a drug-detecting dog with an accompanying police entourage to a house and walking the dog around the porch of the house qualifies as a Fourth Amendment search permissible only with probable cause.

Probable cause exists when there is a fair probability that contraband or evidence of a crime will be found in the place to be searched. The Supreme Court has held that informers’ tips, used to establish probable cause, need not be subjected to uniform, rigid reliability standards. The Florida Supreme Court in Harris held that the prosecution had not established the existence of probable cause because it had failed to satisfy court-mandated standards for the reliability of drug-detecting dogs and their handlers.

In order to minimize the risk of harm to the officers, the destruction of evidence, or the flight of suspects, officers executing a search warrant for contraband may detain individuals found on the premises to be searched. They may do so though they have no probable cause to arrest the individuals. The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in Bailey held that officers enjoy a similar prerogative with respect to individuals whom they allow to leave the premises before apprehending them off-site and returning them to the site of the search.
Contents

Introduction ................................................................................................................................. 1

Florida v. Jardines ...................................................................................................................... 1
  Background ............................................................................................................................ 1
  Supreme Court Precedent .................................................................................................... 2
  Florida Supreme Court ...................................................................................................... 3

Florida v. Harris ........................................................................................................................ 5
  Background ........................................................................................................................... 5
  Supreme Court Precedent and Later Case Law ................................................................. 5
  Florida Supreme Court ...................................................................................................... 7

Bailey v. United States ............................................................................................................. 8
  Background ........................................................................................................................ 9
  Supreme Court Precedent and Later Case Law ................................................................. 9
  Second Circuit .................................................................................................................. 11

Contacts

Author Contact Information .................................................................................................... 12
Introduction

The Supreme Court has agreed to hear three search and seizure cases during its October 2012 term. One involves the question of “[w]ether a trained narcotics-detection dog’s sniff at the front door of a suspected [marijuana] grow house is a Fourth Amendment search,” Florida v. Jardines (Doc. No. 11-564). A second relates to whether an alert by a trained drug-detection dog is sufficient to establish probable cause for a search of a vehicle, Florida v. Harris (Doc. No. 11-817). A third concerns the question of whether “the detention of an individual who has just left premises to be searched under warrant is permissible when the individual is detained out of view of the house as soon as possible,” Bailey v. United States (Doc. No. 11-770).

Florida v. Jardines

Is a dog sniff at the front door of a suspected grow house by a trained narcotics-detection dog a Fourth Amendment search requiring probable cause?

Last term, five Members of the Court declared that a Fourth Amendment “search” occurs when “the Government obtains information by physically intruding on a constitutionally protected area.”¹ This term, the Court has agreed to consider whether a search occurs when the police obtain information in an enterprise that culminates with the performance of a drug-sniffing dog on the front porch of a private house.² An affirmative answer would constitute something of a departure from the Court’s past treatment of dog sniffing cases.³

Background

On November 3, 2006, Miami-Dade Police received an unverified “crime stoppers” tip that Jardines was growing marijuana in his house.⁴ A month later, as part of an elaborate multi-agency enterprise, authorities descended on Jardines’s house at dawn. They saw no activity in the house. The blinds were drawn. The driveway was empty. The air conditioning was running. An officer and a trained drug-sniffing dog entered the front pouch where the dog “alerted” for the presence of drugs, most emphatically at the front door. A second officer then stepped to the front door to conduct a “knock and talk.”⁵ He received no response, but detected the smell of marijuana. He

¹ United States v. Jones, 132 S.Ct. 945, 950 n.3 (2012); id. at 923 (Sotomayor, J., concurring).
⁴ The information in this paragraph was gathered from Jardines v. State, 73 So.3d at 37-8.
⁵ The courts recognize a “knock and talk” exception to the Fourth Amendment’s warrant requirement under which law enforcement officers may enter the curtilage of home for the limited purpose of speaking to any occupant who responds to the knock, e.g., Kentucky v. King, 131 S.Ct. 1849, 1862 (2011); United States v. Robbins, 596 F.3d 1111, 1115-116 (8th Cir. 2012); United States v. Perea-Rev, 680 F.3d 1179, 1187-188 (9th Cir. 2012). Moreover, the Supreme Court has limited the extent to which the federal courts may find a Fourth Amendment violation when they believed law enforcement officials had used the knock and talk exception as a pretext to stimulate exigent circumstances (flight or the destruction of evidence) in order to circumvent the warrant requirement, United States v. Aguirre, 664 F.3d 606, 611 n.13 (5th Cir. 2011)(some internal citations omitted)(“Heretofore, we would precede this discussion by analyzing the threshold issue of whether the law enforcement officers’ decision to conduct a knock and talk was a reasonable investigatory tactic, or whether it impermissibly provoked the exigent circumstance. If we determined that the officers (continued..."
used the dog’s reaction and his own observations to obtain a search warrant. A subsequent search turned up marijuana growing in the house.

On appeal, the Florida district court overturned the trial court’s suppression of the evidence seized at Jardines’s house. The Florida Supreme Court in turn reversed the district court’s decision, concluding that the dog’s use under the circumstances constituted a warrantless search. It also endorsed the trial court’s determination that without the dog-sniffing evidence, authorities had presented insufficient evidence to establish the probable cause necessary for issuance of the search warrant.

Supreme Court Precedent

Drug-sniffing dogs first appear in the Court’s jurisprudence in Place. There, federal agents, suspicious of Place’s conduct when he arrived in New York on a flight from Miami, stopped him, questioned him, and seized his luggage. A trained dog eventually alerted to the presence of drugs in one of the bags. Place sought to suppress evidence found in the bag. The Court concluded that the 90-minute delay between when the luggage was seized and when it was sniffed by dog exceeded the delay permissible under Terry for detention of the luggage detained solely on reasonable suspicion. In doing so, however, the Court observed that “the particular course of investigation that the agents intended to pursue here—exposure of respondent’s luggage, which was located in a public place, to a trained canine—did not constitute a ‘search’ within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment.”

Again in Edmond, the use of dogs was not an issue. But again, the Court noted in passing that use of drug-sniffing dogs in a public area was something less than a typical Fourth Amendment search. Edmond objected to the City’s suspicionless drug checkpoint program that had ensnared him. The program featured a drug-sniffing dog walking around each of the cars stopped at the checkpoint. The Court held the drug-interdiction, law enforcement purpose precluded the program’s claim to the “special needs” exception necessary to excuse the checkpoint seizures without either probable cause or a warrant. In the course of its opinion, the Court pointed out that “[t]he well established that a vehicle stop at a highway checkpoint effectuates a seizure within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. The fact that officers walk a narcotics-detection could have obtained a warrant in lieu of conducting the knock and talk or that it was reasonably foreseeable that the knock and talk would create an exigent circumstance, we would not allow the government to use the exigent circumstance doctrine to justify the officers’ entry and bypass the warrant requirement. However, this inquiry is no longer proper after the United States Supreme Court’s decision in Kentucky v. King, 131 S.Ct. 1849 (2011). That decision narrowed the police-created exigency doctrine adopted by this and other circuits, holding that it may apply only so long as ‘the police did not create the exigency by engaging or threatening to engage in conduct that violates the Fourth Amendment”).

(...continued)

6 State v. Jardines, 9 So.3d 1 (Fla. App. 3d 2008).
7 Jardines v. State, 73 So.3d at 55-6.
8 Id. at 54-5.
10 Id. at 710.
11 Id. at 707.
13 Id. at 48.
dog around the exterior of each car ... does not transform the seizure into a search, see United States v. Place...” Nevertheless, the Court went out of its way to emphasize that the case was not about the use of dogs: “The Chief Justice’s dissent also erroneously characterizes our opinion as holding that the ‘use of a drug-sniffing dog ... annuls what is otherwise plainly constitutional under our Fourth Amendment jurisprudence.’ Again, the constitutional defect of the program is that its primary purpose is to advance the general interest in crime control.”

In Caballes, the dog sniff was the issue, that is, “[w]hether the Fourth Amendment requires reasonable, articulable suspicion to justify using a drug-detecting dog to sniff a vehicle during a legitimate traffic stop.” The Court said no: “A dog sniff conducted during a concededly lawful traffic stop that reveals no information other than the location of a substance that no individual has any right to possess does not violate the Fourth Amendment.” The proposition that the use of a dog, trained to detect drugs, carries no Fourth Amendment implications would seem bode ill for Jardines’s claim.

Florida Supreme Court

The Florida Supreme Court held that the use of a drug-sniffing dog on Jardines’s front porch constituted a search and that such a search required probable cause before it could be conducted. The court distinguished the case at hand from the United States Supreme Court precedents on several grounds.

It noted that the sniff tests conducted in Place, Edmond, and Caballes were all conducted in a “minimally intrusive manner upon objects ... that warrant no special protection.” The Jardines sniff test was a “public spectacle” conducted at a private home, an area entitled to the highest level of Fourth Amendment protection.

Then, the court pointed out that “[a]ll the tests were conducted in an impersonal manner that subjected the defendants to no untoward level of public opprobrium, humiliation or embarrassment.” The Jardines sniff test involved the presence of multiple police vehicles and many officers that produced a spectacle “in a residential neighborhood [that would] invariably entail a degree of public opprobrium, humiliation and embarrassment for the resident ... for such dramatic government activity in the eyes of many—neighbors, passers-by, and the public at large—[would] be viewed as an official accusation of crime.”

---

14 Id. at 44 n.1.
16 Id. at 410.
17 Jardines v. State, 73 So.3d 34, 54, 55 (Fla. 2011)(“Accordingly, we conclude that probable cause, not reasonable suspicion, is the proper evidentiary showing of wrongdoing that the government must make under the Fourth Amendment prior to conducting a dog ‘sniff test’ at a private residence.... Given the special status accorded a citizen’s home in Anglo-American jurisprudence, we hold that the warrantless ‘sniff test’ that was conducted at the front door of the residence in the present case was an unreasonable government intrusion into the sanctity of the home and violated the Fourth Amendment”).
18 Id. at 45.
19 Id. at 48.
20 Id. at 45.
21 Id. at 48.
Finally, the court emphasized that the Place, Edmond, and Caballes tests were conducted under circumstances in which they “were not susceptible to being employed in a discriminatory or arbitrary manner.” 22 In contrast, “if government agents can conduct a dog ‘sniff test’ at a private residence without any prior evidentiary showing of wrongdoing, there is simply nothing to prevent the agents from applying the procedure in an arbitrary or discriminatory manner, or based on whim and fancy, at the home of any citizen.”23

The concurring justices offered another factor: “the lack of a uniform system of training and certification for drug-detection canines ... [:] conditioning and certification programs vary widely in their methods, elements, and tolerances of failure ... [: and] dogs themselves vary in their abilities to accept, retain, or abide by their conditioning in widely varying environments and circumstances.”24

In the absence of exigent circumstances or non-law enforcement special needs, the court concluded that the dog sniff searches such as the one that occurred in Jardines may only be conducted on the basis of probable cause.25

The dissenter’s contended that the majority opinion flew in the face of binding United States Supreme precedent.26 Beyond Place, Edmond, and Caballes, they mention the Court’s observation in Kyllo to the effect that “a Fourth Amendment search does not occur—even when the explicitly protected location of a house is concerned—unless the individual manifested a subjective expectation of privacy in the object of the challenged search and society is will to recognize that expectation as reasonable.”27 Couple this with the Court’s statement “that government conduct that only reveals the possession of contraband compromises no legitimate privacy interest,” and the position of the majority opinion becomes untenable, the dissenters suggested.28

The justices of the Florida Supreme Court, however, did not have the advantage of the United States Supreme Court’s Jones decision. There, a majority of the Court made clear that a Fourth Amendment search occurs whenever the government physically intrudes upon constitutionally protected property.29 The “expectation of privacy” concept, born of Katz, supplements, it does not condition, the traditional protection of the Amendment.30

22 Id. at 45.
23 Id. at 49.
24 Id. at 60 (Lewis, J., with Pariente and Labarga, JJ. concurring).
25 Id. at 54 (“Accordingly, we conclude that probable cause, not reasonable suspicion, is the proper evidentiary showing of wrongdoing that the government must make under the Fourth Amendment prior to conducting a dog ‘sniff test’ at a private residence”).
26 Id. at 61 (Polston, J., with Canady, Ch. J. dissenting).
29 More precisely, where “the Government obtains information by physically intruding on a constitutionally protected area, such a [Fourth Amendment] search has undoubtedly occurred,” United States v. Jones, 132 S.Ct. 945, 950 n.3 (2012); id. at 923 (Sotomayor, J., concurring).
30 “[T]he Katz reasonable-expectation-of-privacy test has been added to, not substituted for, the common-law trespassory test,” id. at 952.
The United States Supreme Court may have had its pending Jones decision in mind when it agreed to hear Jardines. If so, it remains to be seen whether it intended to further develop the theme sounded in Jones or to prevent Jones from being read too broadly.

Florida v. Harris

Has the Florida Supreme Court decided an important question in a way that conflicts with established Fourth Amendment precedent of the U.S. Supreme Court by holding that an alert by a well-trained narcotics-detection dog certified to detect illegal contraband is insufficient to establish probable cause to search a vehicle?

The Florida Supreme Court’s Jardines decision is perhaps not surprising in light of its earlier decision in Harris. It refused to accept a trained drug-detection dog’s positive reaction as per se probable cause in Harris. Instead, it listed a host of criteria under which a trained dog’s alert might be considered probable cause. Neither the per se standard nor Florida court’s list seem consistent with the “totality of the circumstances” standard that the United States Supreme Court has favored heretofore.

Background

A canine officer pulled Harris’s truck over for a traffic violation. His trained dog alerted to the presence of narcotics. A search of the truck, however, did not yield the drugs the dog had been trained to detect. Nevertheless, it did lead to the discovery of precursor chemicals. Two months later, the same canine team again pulled Harris over for a traffic violation with the same result. The dog reacted positively to the presence of drugs, but none were found. The trial court denied Harris’ motion to suppress the evidence seized following the first search. The district court affirmed. The Florida Supreme Court reversed, holding that “the fact that a drug-detection dog has been trained and certified to detect narcotics, standing alone, is not sufficient to demonstrate the reliability of the dog” and thereby establish probable cause to conduct a search.

Supreme Court Precedent and Later Case Law

Probable cause to believe that the search will reveal contraband or evidence of a crime is a prerequisite for the issuance of a search warrant. And probable cause permits police to search a car or truck without a warrant. Probable cause exists when “there is a fair probability that

---

31 The final slip opinions were back from the Public Printer and the Court announced its decision in Jones on January 23, 2012, id. The Court granted certiorari in Jardines on January 6, 2012, 132 S.Ct. 995 (2012).
32 Harris v. State, 71 So.3d 756 (Fla. 2011).
33 The information in this paragraph was gathered from Harris v. State, 71 So.3d at 759-62.
34 Harris v. State, 989 So.2d 1214 (Fla.App. 1st 2008).
35 Harris v. State, 71 So.3d at 774-75.
36 U.S. Const. Amend. IV.
contraband or evidence of a crime will be found in a particular place.” 38 Whether that standard has been met is a common sense assessment of all of the circumstances in a particular case.39

At one point, the Court held that bare, conclusionary statements to a magistrate that officers had reliable information from a credible source, without indicating why the tip was reliable or the source credible, did not constitute probable cause.40 Shortly thereafter, the Court refused to find probable cause to secure a warrant in a case in which the informant’s tip was offered without evidence of the information’s reliability or of the tipster’s credibility, even in the presence of some corroboration of the tip’s accuracy.41 The two cases, Aguilar and Spinelli, led some to believe that an informant’s tip might serve as the basis for probable cause only with evidence of the information’s reliability and tipster’s credibility.42 The Court found this too restrictive a test in Illinois v. Gates. Better instead, it held, to rely upon a “totality of the circumstances” standard that permits a common sense assessment of the individual facts presented in a particular case.43

Since Gates, the federal courts of appeals have usually held (1) that the positive reaction of a dog trained to detect the presence of narcotics is sufficient to establish probable cause,44 but (2) that this general rule applies only if the dog is reliable.45

---

39 Maryland v. Pringle, 540 U.S. 366, 370-71 (2003) (“[T]he probable cause standard is a practical, nontechnical conception that deals with the factual and practical considerations everyday life on which reasonable and prudent men, not legal technicians, act.... The probable-cause standard ... depends on the totality of the circumstances”).
41 Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. 410, 415-16 (1969)(“A magistrate cannot be said to have properly discharged his constitutional duty if he relies on an informer’s tip which – even when partially corroborated – is not as reliable as one which passes Aguilar’s requirements when standing alone”).
42 See e.g., Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 229-30 (1983)(internal citations omitted) (“The Illinois court, alluding to an elaborate set of legal rules that have developed among various lower courts to enforce the ‘two-pronged test,’ found that the test had not been satisfied. First, the ‘veracity’ prong was not satisfied because, ‘[t]here was simply no basis for concluding that the anonymous person [who wrote the letter to the Bloomingdale Police Department] was credible.’ The court indicated that corroboration by police of details contained in the letter might never satisfy the ‘veracity’ prong, and in any event, could not do so if, as in the present case, only ‘innocent’ details are corroborated. In addition, the letter gave no indication of the basis of its writer’s knowledge of the Gateses’ activities. The Illinois court understood Spinelli as permitting the detail contained in a tip to be used to infer that the informant had a reliable basis for his statements, but it thought that the anonymous letter failed to provide sufficient detail to permit such an inference. Thus, it concluded that no showing of probable cause had been made”).
43 Id. at 238-39(internal citations omitted) (“We conclude that it is wiser to abandon the ‘two-pronged test’ established by our decisions in Aguilar and Spinelli. In its place we reaffirm the totality-of-the-circumstances analysis that traditionally has informed probable-cause determinations. The task of the issuing magistrate is simply to make a practical, common-sense decision whether, given all the circumstances set forth in the affidavit before him, including the ‘veracity’ and ‘basis of knowledge’ of persons supplying hearsay information, there is a fair probability that contraband or evidence of a crime will be found in a particular place. And the duty of a reviewing court is simply to ensure that the magistrate had a ‘substantial basis for ... [concluding]’ that probable cause existed. We are convinced that this flexible, easily applied standard will better achieve the accommodation of public and private interests that the Fourth Amendment requires than does the approach that has developed from Aguilar and Spinelli”).
44 United States v. Zamora, 661 F.3d 200, 208 (5th Cir. 2011)(“Once the drug-sniffing dog alerted to the scent of narcotics, the police had probable cause that the drugs were in the Navigator and therefore were authorized to search the vehicle”); United States v. Bowman, 660 F.3d 338, 345 (8th Cir. 2011)(“Assuming that the dog is reliable, a dog sniff resulting in an alert on a container, car, or other item, standing alone gives an officer probable cause to believe that there are drugs present”); United States v. Kitchell, 653 F.3d 1206, 1222 (10th Cir. 2011)(“Mr. Shiromura points to no authority undermining the well-established principle that positive alert from a reliable narcotics-detection dog gives rise to probable cause to search a vehicle”); United States v. Pierce, 622 F.3d 209, 213 (3d Cir. 2010)(“[A] dog’s positive alert while sniffing the exterior of the car provides an officer with the probable cause necessary to search the car without a warrant”); United States v. Brown, 500 F.3d 48, 57 (1st Cir. 2007)(“[A] reliable canine sniff outside a (continued...)”
Florida Supreme Court

The Florida Supreme Court concluded that in Harris the state had failed to show that, taking all the circumstances into account, the alert of a trained dog to the door of a truck entitled an officer to believe that there was a fair probability that the truck contained illicit drugs. The suppression hearing featured apparently uncontradicted evidence that the dog had twice reacted positively to the door of the truck when in fact the truck had none of the drugs the dog was trained to detect. The court did not feel that the state had offered sufficient evidence to explain away the factors that might have contributed to such a result: false alerts attributable to environmental factors, handler cuing or error, or the dog’s inability to distinguish between odors attributable to the current presence of narcotics on the one hand, and residual odors attributable to the presence of narcotics minutes, hours, days, or weeks earlier, on the other. It held that:

(...) continued

...vehicle can provide probable cause to search the vehicle”); Hearn v. Board of Public Education, 191 F.3d 1329, 1333 (11th Cir. 1999)(“Furthermore, the alerting of a drug-sniffing dog to a person’s property supplies not only reasonable suspicion, but probable cause to search that property”); United States v. Thomas, 87 F.3d 909, 912 (7th Cir. 1996)(“[O]nce the dog reacted positively for narcotics, the officers had probable cause to obtain a search warrant for the suitcase.... “).

45 United States v. Ludwig, 641 F.3d 1243, 1251 (10th Cir. 2011)(internal citations omitted)(“[I]t goes without saying that a drug dog’s alert establishes probable cause only if that dog is reliable. But none of this means we mount a full-scale statistical inquisition into each dog’s history. Instead, courts typically rely on the dog’s certification as proof of its reliability”); United States v. Bowen, 660 F.3d 338, 345 (8th Cir. 2011)(emphasis added)(“Assuming that the dog is reliable, a dog sniff resulting in an alert on a container, car, or other item, standing alone gives an officer probable cause to believe that there are drugs present”); United States v. Pierce, 622 F.3d 209, 213 (3d Cir. 2010)(“[A] dog’s positive alert while sniffing the exterior of the car provides an officer with the probable cause necessary to search the car without a warrant”); United States v. Howard, 621 F.3d 433, 447 (6th Cir. 2010)(emphasis added)(“A positive indication by a properly-trained dog is sufficient to establish probable cause for the presence of a controlled substance”); United States v. Brown, 500 F.3d 48, 57 (1st Cir. 2007)(emphasis added)(“[A] reliable canine sniff outside a vehicle can provide probable cause to search the vehicle”); cf., United States v. Stubblefield, 682 F.3d 502, 506 (6th Cir. 2012)(internal citations omitted)(“We uphold a district court’s findings regarding the training and reliability of a drug-detection dog unless those findings are clearly erroneous. A dog’s training and reliability can be established by the testimony of the dog’s handler alone. If the evidence adduced, ‘whether testimony from the dog’s trainer or records of the dog’s training, establishes that the dog is generally certified as a drug-detection dog, any other evidence, including the testimony of other experts, that may detract from the reliability of the dog’s performance properly goes to the ‘credibility’ of the dog. Lack of additional evidence, such as documentation of the exact course of training, similarly would affect the dog’s reliability. As with the admissibility of evidence generally, the admissibility of evidence regarding a dog’s training and reliability is committed to the trial court’s sound discretion”.

46 Harris v. State, 71 So.3d at 758-59 (“The issue of when a dog’s alert provides probable cause for a search hinges on the dog’s reliability as a detector of illegal substances within a vehicle. We hold that the State may establish probable cause by demonstrating that the officer had a reasonable basis for believing the dog to be reliable based on the totality of the circumstances ... Evidence that the dog has been trained and certified to detect narcotics, standing alone, is not sufficient to establish the dog’s reliability for purposes of determining probable cause – especially since training certification in this state are not standardized and thus each training and certification program may differ with no meaningful way to assess them”).

47 Id. at 762.

48 Id. at 767-68 (“We first note that there is no uniform standard in this state or nationwide for an acceptable level of training, testing, or certification for drug-detection dogs. In contrast to dual-purpose drug-detection dogs [(dogs trained both detect drugs and apprehend suspects)], which are apparently certified by FDLE, no such required certification exists in this state for dogs like Aldo, who is a single-purpose drug-detection dog [(a dog trained only to detect drugs)]. In the absence of a uniform standard, the reliability of the dog cannot be established by demonstrating only that a canine is trained and certified. Simply characterizing a dog as ‘trained’ and ‘certified’ imparts scant information about what the dog has been conditioned to do or not to do, or how successfully.... Second, and related to the first concern, any presumption of reliability based only on the fact that the dog has been trained and certified does not take into account the potential for false alerts, the potential for handler error, and the possibility of alerts to residual odors”).
To meet its burden of establishing that the officer had a reasonable basis for believing the dog to be reliable in order to establish probable cause, the State must present the training and certification records, an explanation of the meaning of the particular training and certification of that dog, field performance records, and evidence concerning the experience and training of the officer handling the dog, as well as any other objective evidence known to the officer about the dog’s reliability in being able to detect the presence of illegal substances within the vehicle. To adopt the contrary view that the burden is on the defendant to present evidence of the factors other than certification and training in order to demonstrate that the dog is unreliable would be contrary to the well-established proposition that the burden is on the State to establish probable cause for a warrantless search. In addition, since all of the records and evidence are in the possession of the State, to shift the burden to the defendant to produce evidence of the dog’s unreliability is unwarranted and unduly burdensome.49

The dissent objected that the court demanded certainty where the Fourth Amendment required only probability: “[T]he majority demands a level of certainty that goes beyond what is required by the governing probable cause standard.... The majority here ... imposes evidentiary requirements which can readily be employed to ensure that the police rely on drug-detection dogs only when the dogs are shown to be virtually infallible.” 50

Bailey v. United States

Whether, under Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692, 705 (1981), the detention of an individual who has just left the premises to be searched under warrant is permissible when the individual is detained out of view of the house as soon as practicable.

The Fourth Amendment prohibits unreasonable searches and seizures.51 Searches and seizures are presumptively unreasonable, unless they are conducted pursuant to a warrant issued by a neutral magistrate upon a sworn showing of probable cause.52 Nevertheless, there are circumstances under which authorities enjoy limited authority to detain an individual without a warrant and with less than probable cause to believe the individual has committed a crime. One such instance occurs when officers seek to execute a search warrant. Then, said the Supreme Court in Michigan v. Summer, “a warrant to search for contraband founded on probable cause implicitly carries with it the limited authority to detain the occupants of the premises while a proper search is conducted.” 53 Some of the lower federal courts have permitted detention only within the letter of the Summers rule;54 others have permitted detention consistent with its spirit. The Supreme Court granted certiorari in Bailey to consider the question.55

---

49 Id. at 759.
50 Id. at 776 (Canady, Ch.J., dissenting).
51 U.S. Const. Amend. IV.
54 E.g., United States v. Edwards, 103 F.3d 90, 94 (10th Cir. 1996); United States v. Sherrill, 27 F.3d 344, 346 (8th Cir. 1994).
Background

The First District Court of New York issued a warrant for the search of the basement apartment at 103 Lake Drive and for a “chrome .380 handgun” believed to be found there.\(^{56}\) Shortly before execution of the warrant, narcotics detectives saw two men come up the stairs from the basement of the building and drive away. Both men, later identified as Bailey and a companion, matched the informant’s general description of the resident of the apartment. The officers followed them, and pulled them over after they had travelled about a mile. They patted down the two men, handcuffed them, and seized Bailey’s wallet and keys. The detectives called for a patrol car that carried Bailey and his companion back to the apartment. They returned Bailey’s wallet, but used his keys to drive his car back to the apartment. Once there, officers, who had executed the warrant in the meantime, disclosed that they had discovered a handgun and drugs in plain view. Then, they arrested Bailey.

At some point, Bailey was turned over to federal authorities. He was charged with possession of cocaine, possession of a firearm by a felon, and possession of a firearm during and in furtherance of drug trafficking.\(^{57}\) His pre-trial motion to suppress the evidence he claimed was seized in violation of the Fourth Amendment was denied.\(^{58}\) He was convicted and sentenced to prison for thirty years and to five years of supervised release.\(^{59}\) He unsuccessfully petitioned for relief in the nature of habeas corpus based on a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel.\(^{60}\) The Second Circuit Court of Appeals considered the appeal of the denial of petition together with the appeal of his conviction.\(^{61}\) It affirmed both his conviction and the denial of relief under §2255.\(^{62}\)

Speaking with regard to the Fourth Amendment issue, the Second Circuit declared that “‘Summers applies with equal force when, for officer safety reasons, police do not detain the occupant on the curbside, but rather wait for him to leave the immediate area and detain him as soon as practicable.’ That is, Summers imposes upon police a duty based on both geographic and temporal proximity; police must identify an individual in the process of leaving the premises subject to search and detain him as soon as practicable during the execution of the search.”\(^{63}\)

Supreme Court Precedent and Later Case Law

In Summers, the police arrived to execute a search warrant for narcotics as Summers was leaving the house to be searched and coming down the steps. They detained him until after they had entered the house and then brought him inside. When the search uncovered suspected narcotics in the cellar, they arrested him. They discovered a packet of heroin in his pocket in a search incident

---

\(^{56}\) The information in this paragraph was gathered from United States v. Bailey, 652 F.3d 197, 200-202 (2d Cir. 2011).

\(^{57}\) Id. at 199 (21 U.S.C. 841(a)(1), (b)(1)(B)(ii)(possession with intent to distribute at least 5 grams of cocaine base); 18 U.S.C. 922(g)(1), 924(a)(2)(possession of a firearm by a previously convicted felon); 18 U.S.C. 924(c)(1)(A)(i) (possession of a firearm during and in furtherance of drug trafficking)).

\(^{58}\) Id.

\(^{59}\) Id. at 199.

\(^{60}\) Id. at 202 (28 U.S.C. 2255 affords federal prisoners relief if they can establish that they are being held in violation of the Constitution or other laws of the United States).

\(^{61}\) Id. at 199 n.1.

\(^{62}\) Id. at 208.

\(^{63}\) Id. at 206, quoting the district court, United States v. Bailey, 468 F.Supp.2d 373, 381 n.4 (E.D.N.Y. 2006).
to his arrest. The Supreme Court held that “a warrant to search for contraband founded on probable cause carries with it the limited authority to detain the occupants of the premises while a proper search is conducted.”

Several considerations influenced the Court’s decision. First, detaining Summers would reduce the risk of flight should the search reveal incriminating evidence. Second, detaining Summers would reduce the risk that he or someone in the premises whom he might warn would destroy evidence. Third, detaining Summers would reduce the risk of harm to the officers, particularly if incriminating evidence were discovered. Last, Summers’s presence during the execution of a search warrant might assist in the orderly completion of the search.

Two decades later, the Court pointed out in Muehler v. Mena that the Summers rule implies the authority to use reasonable force to detain occupants, including handcuffing them in some instances. The use of handcuffs may be particularly appropriate when firearms are the object of the search and risk of violence is real. The Court mentioned but placed no significance on fact that, unlike Summers, Muehler involved a search warrant for evidence rather than for contraband.

The Second Circuit acknowledged that the federal courts of appeals are divided over the question of whether the Summers rule may be extended. Like the Second Circuit, the Fourth, Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth Circuits admit the possibility of some extension of the rule. The Fifth and Tenth Circuits have declined to expand it.

---

64 Michigan v. Summers. 452 U.S. at 705.
65 Id. at 702 (“Most obvious is the legitimate law enforcement interest in preventing flight in the event that incriminating evidence is found”).
66 Id. (“[T]he execution of a warrant to search for narcotics is the kind of transaction that may give rise to sudden violence or frantic efforts to conceal or destroy evidence”).
67 Id. at 702-3 (“Less obvious, but sometimes of greater importance is the interest in minimizing the risk of harm to the officers. Although no special danger to the police is suggested by the evidence in this record, the execution of a warrant to search for narcotics is the kind of transaction that may give rise to sudden violence or frantic efforts to conceal or destroy evidence. The risk of harm to both the police and the occupants is minimized if the officers routinely exercise unquestioned command of the situation”).
68 Id. at 703 (“Finally, the orderly completion of the search may be facilitated if the occupants of the premises are present. Their self-interest may induce them to open locked doors or locked containers to avoid the use of force that is not only damaging to property but may also delay the completion of the task at hand”).
69 Muehler v. Mena, 544 U.S. 93, 98-9 (2005). Justice Kennedy joined in the 5-4 majority but penned a separate concurrence “to help ensure that police handcuffing during searches becomes neither routine nor unduly prolonged.” Id. at 102 (Kennedy, J., concurring).
70 Id. at 100 (“But this was no ordinary search. The government interests in not only detaining, but using handcuffs, are at their maximum when, as here, a warrant authorizes a search for weapons and a wanted gang member resides on the premises”).
71 Id. at 95-6 (“Muehler obtained a search warrant for 1363 Patricia Avenue that authorized a broad search of the house and premises for among other things, deadly weapons and evidence of gang membership”).
72 United States v. Bailey, 652 F.3d at 204-205.
73 See e.g., United States v. Montieth, 662 F.3d 660, 668 (4th Cir. 2011) (“[O]fficers may reasonably conclude in appropriate circumstances that attempting to detain the resident inside his home may unnecessarily elevate the safety risks attendant to a search.... Here, the officers assessed the inherent risks of a drug search, along with the additional problem of forcing entry into a house with two young children inside, and took the precaution of first seeking a consensual entry [after they had pulled over the occupant shortly after he had left the premises to be searched], id. at 667 (“We do not suggest that any detention away from the home to be searched is invariably a reasonable one. The test is an objective one, and in some circumstances the distance from the home may combine with other factors surrounding (continued...)"
Second Circuit

The Second Circuit’s Bailey decision permits off-site detention incident to the execution of a search warrant under some conditions. Police may remotely detain someone who leaves the premises to be searched, if they do so as soon as practicable. The decision must be supported by the Summers factors: officer safety, preservation of evidence, and/or prevention of flight.

In the case at hand, the court concluded that the officers’ decision not to detain Bailey until after he drove away from the premises was reasonable under the circumstances. The warrant authorized the search for a firearm in the apartment occupied by a man fitting Bailey’s description the search to present an objectively unreasonable plan of warrant execution”); United States v. Bullock, 632 F.3d 1004, 1019 (7th Cir. 2011)(“The issue here is whether the reasoning in Summers should be extended to an individual who has left the residence before execution of the search warrant, is pulled over a few blocks away, and is detained during the search. Under the particular facts of this case, we find that it should. Bullock’s detention was reasonable given his suspected criminal activity in connection with the residence, his risk of flight, and the potential danger he posed to officers if not detained”); United States v. Cavazos, 288 F.3d 706, 711 (5th Cir. 2002)(“Cavazos attempts to distinguish the instant case from Summers on the basis of geographic proximity. Whereas the defendant in Summers had just exited the house and was on the front steps when the police detained him, Cavazos was two blocks away from the residence [after his departure]. In the instant case, Cavazos’s behavior immediately before the detention [(turning on the officers following him)] and his connection to the house – as either occupant or resident – provided the agents with ample justification to detain him during the search”); United States v. Cochran, 939 F.2d 337, 339 (6th Cir. 1991) (“In Summers, police stopped the individual as he was descending the front steps. In contrast here, police stopped defendant after he had driven a short distance from his home. We do not find this distinction significant, however. Summers does not impose upon police a duty based on geographic proximity (i.e., defendant must be detained while still on his premises); rather, the focus is upon police performance, that is, whether the police detained defendant as soon as practicable after departing from his residence”).

(...)continued

United States v. Edwards, 103 F.3d 90, 94 (10th Cir. 1996)(“Unlike the defendant in Summers, who was present where the search warrant was executed, Edwards did not know – prior to being stopped – that any warrant was being executed. He thus had no reason to flee. The police knew the address of Edwards’s Denver residence, and had no reason to believe that he would not return to it... Neither of the latter two Summers interests were served in any way by Edwards’s extended detention. First, the police quickly determined that Edwards posed no risk of harm to them. Second, and in contrast to the defendant in Summers, Edwards’s streetside detention played no part in facilitating the orderly completion of a search being conducted three blocks away”); United States v. Sherrill, 27 F.3d 344, 346 (8th Cir. 1994)(“Here, because Sherrill had already exited the premises, the intrusiveness of the officers’ stop and detention on the street was much greater. In addition, although Sherrill did help the officers conduct the search, when the officers stopped Sherrill, the officers had no interest in preventing flight or minimizing the search’s risk because Sherrill had left the area of the search and was unaware of the warrant. Thus, we decline the Government’s invitation to extend Summers to the circumstances of this case”).

United States v. Bailey, 652 F.3d at 206 (“Summers applies with equal force when, for officer safety reasons, police do not detain the occupant on the curbside, but rather wait for him to leave the immediate area and detain him as soon as practicable”).

Id. (“Summers imposes upon police a duty based on both geographic and temporal proximity; police must identify an individual in the process of leaving the premises subject to search and detain him as soon as practicable during the execution of the search”).

Id. at 206 n.6 (“Indeed, at least two of the law enforcement interests articulated in Summers apply here – namely, prevention of flight should incriminating evidence be found during the search and minimizing the risk of harm to the officers”).
and alleged to be trafficking in drugs.78 Moreover, Bailey’s detention involved neither unwarranted delays nor efforts to exploit the detention to secure additional evidence.79

Author Contact Information

Charles Doyle
Senior Specialist in American Public Law
cdoyle@crs.loc.gov, 7-6968

78 Id. (“In light of the fact that the officers had reason to suspect that the occupant of 103 Lake Drive sold drugs out of the house and had a gun in his possession, it was reasonable for the officers to assume that detaining Bailey outside the house might lead to the destruction of evidence or unnecessarily risk the safety of the officers”).

79 Id. at 206-207(internal citations omitted)(“Finally, Bailey’s detention was not ‘unreasonably prolonged’ He was detained for less than ten minutes before he was taken back to 103 Lake Drive. By the time he returned to the site of the search, the search was underway and he was formally placed under arrest within five minutes of the entry team’s execution of the warrant. Of equal importance, officers did not attempt to exploit the detention by trying to obtain additional evidence from Bailey during execution of the search warrant”).