

Updated June 1, 2020

What Role Might the Federal Government Play in Law Enforcement Reform?

Over the past few years, several high-profile police-involved shootings and alleged instances of excessive force have generated congressional interest in state and local policing. Congressional interest in policing reformrevolves primarily around the public's confidence in the police and accountability for excessive use of force. What role should Congress play in facilitating efforts to bolster confidence in the police? Should Congress seek to improve law enforcement's accountability regarding the excessive use of force? These questions are bounded by limits of congressional authority.

Limits of Congressional Authority

The federalized system of government in the United States limits the influence Congress can have over state and local law enforcement policies.

The U.S. Constitution established a federal government of limited powers. A general police power is not among them. That authority is largely reserved for the states. The Constitution, however, does vest Congress with legislative powers under the Spending, Commerce, Territorial, and Necessary and Proper Clauses, as well as under the enforcement sections of the Civil War Amendments. Congress has exercised this authority in the past to enact legislation that relates to law enforcement matters. Yet even here, its authority is not boundless.

Congress may spend for the general welfare and thereby encourage states to take or refrain from various activities. In doing so, however, the encouraged state action must relate to the purpose for which federal funds are spent. Moreover, state action may be encouraged, not commandeered or compelled. Commandeering and compulsion are also beyond the scope of the Commerce Clause, which otherwise empowers Congress to regulate the flow, instrumentalities, and substantial impacts of interstate and foreign commerce. Congress may enact model legislation for federal enclaves, but its reach there is geographically limited. The Necessary and Proper Clause permits implementing legislation, but only to the extent this legis lation reasonably relates to powers that the Constitution elsewhere grants to the federal government. Finally, each of the Civil War Amendments—the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments conveys the power to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation, but that power is cabined by the terms of the amendment and by judicial interpretation of its breadth.

Tools Available to the Federal Government to Promote Law Enforcement Reform

If Congress wants to influence local policing, it can hone at least three items in the federal criminal justice toolkit: policing-related data collection by the U.S. government, federal processes to investigate local police misconduct, and the relationship between the Department of Justice (DOJ) and police throughout the United States.

Federal Data Collection Efforts on Police Use of Force

The federal government collects and disseminates limited data on the use of force by state and local police. Several programs gather this kind of information, but none collects data on every use of force incident in the United States.

- On January 1, 2019, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) launched its use of force data collection system. The FBI program collects data on incidents that result in the death or serious bodily injury of a person, or when a law enforcement officer discharges a firearm at or in the direction of a person. Law enforcement agencies are encouraged, but not required, to participate. The FBI has yet to release any publications using these data.
- Every three years, in its Police Public Contact Survey (PPCS), the Bureau of Justice Statistics collects data on citizens' interactions with police, including police use of force. While the PPCS produces reliable national estimates of police use of force, it is a survey, not a census of all such incidents. The most recent data available are from 2015.
- The National Violent Death Reporting System (NVDRS), administered by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, operates in all states, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico. Researchers in these states gather and link records from law enforcement, coroners and medical examiners, vital statistics, and crime laboratories. The NVDRS can provide data on deaths resulting from "legal interventions."
- Congress passed the Death in Custody Reporting Act of 2013 (DCRA, P.L. 113-242), which reauthorized the Death in Custody Reporting program. This act requires states to submit data to DOJ regarding the death of any person who is detained, under arrest, in the process of being arrested, en route to be incarcerated, or incarcerated at a municipal or county jail, a state prison, a state-run boot camp prison, a boot camp prison that is contracted out by the state, any local or state contract facility, or any other local or state correctional facility (including juvenile facilities). States face up to a 10% reduction in their funding under the Edward Byrne Memorial Justice Assistance Grant (JAG) programif they do not provide the data. Starting with FY2019, states have been required to submit data required by DCRA as a condition of receiving JAG funding.

Investigating Law Enforcement Misconduct

The federal government has several ways to ensure that state and local law enforcement practices and procedures adhere to constitutional norms. The first is criminal enforcement brought directly against an offending officer under federal civil rights statutes. Section 242 of Title 18 makes it a federal crime to willfully deprive a person of his or her constitutional rights while acting under color of law. Similarly, Section 241 of Title 18 outlaws conspiracies to deprive someone of his or her constitutional rights.

More broadly, a key federal statute focuses on the civil liability of law enforcement agencies as a whole, rather than the wrongdoing of individual officers. Section 12601 of Title 34 prohibits government authorities or their agents from engaging in a "pattern or practice of conduct by law enforcement officers ... that deprives persons of rights ... secured or protected by the Constitution or laws of the United States." It authorizes the Attorney General to sue for equitable or declaratory relief when he or she has "reas onable cause to believe" that such a pattern of constitutional violations has occurred.

The Influence of DOI on Policing

DOJ and its component agencies, such as the FBI, can help shape policing in the United States. Such influence can be seen in at least four roles that DOJ and its components play on this stage:

- Enforcer—DOJ can investigate and prosecute federal laws related to police abuse of power. For example, the FBI can initiate cases involving official mis conduct, which DOJ can prosecute. In addition, DOJ's Civil Rights Division can review the patterns or practices "of law enforcement agencies that may be violating people's federal rights" and seek civil remedies when "law enforcement agencies have policies or practices that foster a pattern of mis conduct by employees."
- Policy leader—DOJ can serve as a model for state and local law enforcement. For example, it is sues guidance for law enforcement agencies; sets policies for its own agencies that resonate broadly in federal, state, and local law enforcement; and provides training.
- Convener—DOJ brings together representatives from law enforcement agencies and local communities to discuss policing is sues. For example, its Community Relations Service facilitates discussions among police, government officials, community residents, and various

- community groups. This component of DOJ does not investigate or prosecute crimes, take sides in a dispute, impose solutions, as sign blame, or as sess fault.
- Funder—DOJ awards grants to state and local police, as well as researchers probing important policing questions.

Law Enforcement Reform Efforts in the Current Congress

Despite limits on congressional power to shore up trust and accountability within local policing contexts, legislation introduced in the 116th Congresses seeks to influence police practices. Such legislation would attempt to (1) better understand and track use of force by law enforcement; (2) reform how investigations of police-involved deaths are conducted; (3) require law enforcement agencies to provide more training on is sues such as implicit bias or racial profiling to their officers; (4) promote diversity in police hiring; and (5) expand the use of body-worn cameras. Much of the legislation introduced in this Congress focuses on altering existing federal tools historically used to shape local policing.

Policy Options

There are several options policymakers might examine should they choose to play a role in facilitating better police-community relations and accountability for excessive use of force, including the following:

- placing conditions on federal funding to encourage law enforcement to adopt policy changes to promote better community relations by, for example, expanding training or reforming how use of force investigations are conducted;
- requiring DOJ to develop model policies or best practices regarding the use of force, training standards, or accreditation;
- expanding efforts to collect more comprehensive data on the use of force by law enforcement officers;
- providing grants to law enforcement agencies for the purchase of body-worn cameras for their officers;
- taking steps to facilitate investigations and prosecutions of excessive force by amending 18 U.S.C. Section 242 to reduce the mens rea standard in federal prosecutions, or place conditions on federal funds to promote the use of special prosecutors at the state level; or
- using the influence of congressional authority to affect the direction of national criminal justice policy.

Nathan James, Analystin Crime Policy Ben Harrington, Legislative Attorney

IF10572

Disclaimer

This document was prepared by the Congressional Research Service (CRS). CRS serves as nonpartisan shared staff to congressional committees and Members of Congress. It operates solely at the behest of and under the direction of Congress. Information in a CRS Report should not be relied upon for purposes other than public understanding of information that has been provided by CRS to Members of Congress in connection with CRS's institutional role. CRS Reports, as a work of the United States Government, are not subject to copyright protection in the United States. Any CRS Report may be reproduced and distributed in its entirety without permission from CRS. However, as a CRS Report may include copyrighted images or material from a third party, you may need to obtain the permission of the copyright holder if you wish to copy or otherwise use copyrighted material.